***** ROOT GROWING FOR THE MAN WITH A

By R. S. SHAW,

DEAN OF THE MICHIGAN AGRICULTURAL COL-LEGE.

******** THERE are but few tillable areas in the United States where some one or more of the various kinds of root crops cannot be grown. And there are few me entaged in mixed farming on a small cale but what could use them to good advantage. But, generally speaking, when the word roots is mentioned the imagination presents to the mind's eye a ten-acre field suggestive of prolonged bachache. We do not suggest the growing of large areas of roots, considering the way in which we propose to use them, but rather from one to three acres for the size of farm under consideration. This small area, fir suitable and properly handled, c.n be made to produce a large tonnage. The average yield for the several root crops computed from six consecutive years' trials, by Zavitz of Onjario. 16 suited in the following tonnage per acre. viz: Carrets, 28 tons per acre: mangolds, 24; turnips, 23; ru:abagaz 20, and sugar beets, 17 tons. The area of roots, mostly mangolds, grown annually at the Michigan Agricultural college, does not exceed three areas and yet is sufficient to produce the moderate amount needed for our cattle, sheep and hogs during the winter season. The land devoted to if suitable and properly handled, c.n winter season. The land devoted to roots should be located within reasonable distance of the farm buildings if possible; in general a deep, rich loam soil is desirable, and liberal supplies of barnyard manure will always produce a marked response in the

In harvesting turnips and rutabagas they can be topped with a sharp hoe while still in the ground, and the roots tipped out of the ground with a plow. In harvesting the short, thick-bodied mangold, such as Golden Tankard, we uproot them by dragging an inverted harrow both ways across the piece and the tops are twisted off by hand when picked up for loading. The extremely long varieties cannot be havested in this way without more or less of them being broken; they are much heavier yielders than the short, thick-shape i kinds, but are not as go d keepers or feeders.

For stock purposes we ton a he r rots and sugar beets with the hie, and in the absence of a beet I'l er, remove them with a plow by cu ting ro-close to the row as to leave one side of the roots exposed. The carrot is diffice 1 to raise, requiring so much tedious hand labor. We grow but a few rows of these for horse feet.

The secret of success in storing roots consists in keeping them in the lowest possible temperature without freezing.
